JACKPOT ULTRASOUND CARCASS EVALUATION CONTEST

The purpose of this live animal appraisal is to effectively determine economically important beef carcass traits when it is impractical to actually slaughter the cattle and measure the carcass. The utilization of ultrasound technology is a practical means of identifying these traits with an acceptable degree of accuracy. However, the most accurate evaluation of beef carcasses has been, and still is, to slaughter the cattle and evaluate the carcasses accordingly. The use of ultrasound has proven invaluable for live cattle exhibits where slaughtering is not viable. It also has proven highly acceptable in beef breeding cattle selection.

To determine YIELD GRADE for this event, ultrasound measures the ribeye area (REA) and the fat thickness (FT). In addition, these measurements are combined with the hot carcass weight and an average percent kidney, pelvic, and heart fat (%KPH). The %KPH is an assigned 3.5% of the hot carcass weight which is a reasonably accepted average. The hot carcass weight is designated 62% dressing percentage of the un-shrunk live-weight. These four factors are the basis for determining USDA YIELD GRADE. The YIELD GRADE score is 1 through 5 with 1 being the most desirable.

In actual carcass appraisal, QUALITY GRADE is determined primarily by visual observation of the amount and distribution of intramuscular fat in the ribeye and is referred to as marbling. The USDA system recognizes marbling score from slightly abundant to trace and assigns quality grades from prime, being the highest, to standard, being the lesser.

Ultrasound measures the approximate percentage of intramuscular fat within the ribeye and is referred to as (IMF). This percentage is translated to the USDA QUALITY GRADE scale, again using the terminology prime, choice +, choice, choice -, select, and standard. The accuracy of IMF, relative to marbling score, is quite high.

Statistically, the YIELD GRADE and QUALITY GRADE are utilized together in this application. The result is referred to as ADJUSTED YIELD GRADE. The use of the ADJUSTED YIELD GRADE to evaluate live beef cattle carcasses is based on the ability of this system to effectively identify carcasses that meet industry specifications for economically important carcass traits.
